Public Watchdogs Documentary exposes Edison's PR machine

FACT: Southern California Edison has the WORST nuclear safety record in the USA.

This may be why the company routinely makes deceptive statements to the public at its "Community Engagement Panel" meetings.

The deceptions are documented in a new eight-minute video by Public Watchdogs which exposes how Edison uses the Community Engagement Panel as its forum to distort the truth about unsafe nuclear waste containers, unlawful behavior, and a horrific safety record.

Keep in mind, these are the same engineers that botched the nuclear steam generator design that failed, giving our community a radiation leak in 2012. Please share this important video with everybody you know.

Community Engagement Panel to Meet September 14

Why do they call it a "Community Engagement Panel?" Get the truth by attending in person September 14. Details on reverse.

Who We Are and What We Do

Public Watchdogs is a tax-deductible California nonprofit formed under the premise that the "public has a right to know" how the government conducts the public's business.

Meet our latest intern

Intern Nick DeMarco at another grueling day of work at a Public Watchdogs press conference. Nick is a Digital Arts Major at Palomar College, San Marcos.

Few jobs are tougher than being an intern at Public Watchdogs, but our newest intern Nick DeMarco is up to the task. Nick is a Digital Arts Major at Palomar College and is instrumental in creating, editing and producing digital media for us.

Holtec “dry casks” all wet

Public Watchdogs wants all spent nuclear fuel stored in “dry casks” because they’re safer. A dry cask is usually a foot to 19” thick, and is also moveable.

That’s a far cry from the canisters made by Holtec, the manufacturer of the nuclear waste storage system at San Onofre. Holtec’s cans are just that – cans. The walls on are a mere 5/8” thick, less than the width of a dime.

Apparently, the Union of Concerned Scientists endorsed the Holtec cans because they thought they were actually dry casks. Ouch.

Get the dirt about what’s getting buried on the beach at San Onofre.

Unbelievably, Edison inked a deal with Holtec Manufacturing to store nuke waste that’s deadly for millions of years in containers that are only guaranteed to last ten years. Get the full story on our Web site at www.publicwatchdogS.org
